Not Now Dear... I'm Gathering My Thoughts is a sharp, ambitious voyage through modern gender dynamics, dating, and digital illusions, told through the eyes of an 'globe trotting' engineer with a poetic soul and a pirate's wit. Tristan Coates hoists the sails on society's unspoken shifts, navigating feminism, masculinity, technology, and tradition with depth, danger, and a splash of Merlot. Think naval metaphors, scientific musings, cultural heat maps, and quotes you'll want to underline twice. Part observation deck, part call to arms, this book dares you to look beneath the surface. If you've ever felt adrift in the age of filtered faces and fractured roles, this is your periscope. Read it, laugh, flinch, reflect—and maybe change your course. Best read, with a bottle of red.

Tristan Coates NER CPEng is an Australian environmental engineer and physics enthusiast who once wrote an academic thesis on women's link to the natural environment, and has spent the following decade observing those ideas against real world experience. He has worked across continents and countries ranging from water treatment plants, to international development programs including Oxford studies on The First Civilisation. His observations stem not just from boardrooms and bureaucracies, but from bridges, communities, and countless inner monologues, with an Australian edge.
